The Tycoon's Tender Triumph Elizabeth Lennox 2012-02-24 Ever since she'd realized men were more than just irritants, Chloe had been fascinated by Sam Marchant. As the years went by, that fascination had grown into infatuation, to the point where simple dates with other men left her cold and unmoved. So when Sam showed up in her life once again, larger than life and sexier than ever, Chloe was furious that she still had feelings for this man who would take her out to dinner one night, talk and laugh and make her feel special, then go out with another woman the following night. She tried very hard to hate Sam for that betrayal, but her body couldn't resist the allure of his magnificent physique. It was like her mind was telling her to run but her feet were...not just standing still but wrapping themselves around Sam's waist while her mouth kissed him with all the longing and need pent up for years. Sam stepped in and gave her the courage to follow her dream. And that led to one incredible night in his bed. A night Sam was unwilling to allow being a one night stand. Getting Chloe to the altar though was going to be his biggest challenge because she was afraid of him for reasons she refused to discuss. He would win though, and he'd show her a love as big as the Texas sky. She just had to trust herself enough to let that love into her heart.

A Protocol for Touch Constance Merritt 2000
"Constance Merritt is a poet to defeat categories, to oppose 'the tyranny of names' with a poetry that sets its own terms of encounter, its 'protocols of touch'--tender and austere, formal and intimate at once. Hers is a voice with many musics, sufficiently rich, nuanced and various to express, maintain poise and wrest meaning from the powerful cross-currents in which the heart is torn. I have seldom seen intelligence equal to such a scorching degree of intensity, or mastery of form so equal to passion's contradictory occasions. Merritt's prosodic range is prodigious--she moves in poetic forms as naturally as a body moves in its skin, even as her lines ring with the cadenced authority of a gifted and schooled ear. Here, in her words, the iambic ground bass is in its vital questioning mode: "The heart's insistent undersong: how live?/how live? How live?" this poetry serves no lesser necessity than to ask that."--Eleanor Wilner

Between us, how we wrestle over words
Strain to wring some blessing from the silence, Deliverance from violence, its fear, its lure,
The tyranny of names: night day, Sable and alabaster, flint shale, Steel and lace. Who among us can afford To speak the language--any language--rightly? As if it weren't enough to bear one heart Eternally divided in its chambers? We stand close enough to touch. We do Not touch.

Between us burns a sword of fire, A rusted turnstile glinting in the sun.
